| 1.                                   | 2.                                  | 3.                                |
| Pastime with good company,           | Youth must have some dalliance,     | Company with honesty,             |
| I love, and shall until I die.       | Of good or ill some pastance.       | Is virtue, vices to flee.         |
| Grudge who lust, but none deny,      | Company methinks then best,         | Company is good and ill,          |
| So God be pleased, thus live will I. | All thoughts and fancies to digest. | But every man hath his free will. |
| For my pastance:                     | For idleness,                       | The best ensue,                   |
| Hunt, sing, and dance,               | Is chief mistress                   | The worst eschew,                 |
| My heart is set!                     | Of vices all:                       | My mind shall be:                 |
| All goodly sport,                    | Then who can say,                   | Virtue to use,                    |
| For my comfort,                      | But mirth and play                  | Vice to refuse,                   |
| Who shall me let?                    | Is best of all?                     | Thus shall I use me!              |
